I found a match, lit the lamp and started down stairs. My eyes took on the conventional stony flight of stares that people wear while walking in their sleep. As I passed the room occupied by my father and mother I redoubled my silence so as not to awake myself suddenly. Finally I reached the pantry. A pantry and a coterie and a vestry all belong to the same class. So does cholers. I did not expect to be attacked by holera. I did not expect to be attacked by this cute spell when I started out. I repeat that I reached the pantry, and there I found my long, lost brother. When he heard my feet-prints, he turned toward me with a dull look of unrecognition about the eyes and a good deal of isolated jam bout his otherwise vacant countenance. 1 looked at him with a gaze as imbecile as his own. the made straight for the jam, and when he saw the empty jars he said something that would have impaired the sale of a Sunday school book. On thinking it over, I believe it reflected on his sons. He opened the last remaining jar and scooping out a big spoonful of jam car-ried it to his sleeping and unconscious mouth. That settled us. We ru-hed past bim, out into the dining-room and fled. Sompambulism seldom took such a strong and terrible hold on prominent people as R did when it tackled our family that night. Next morning at breakfast, the lady of the house jumped on me and demanded to know about the jam. I told her I must bave been in a somnambulistic condition and wrapped myself around it. But I winked at my discomfitted pa so hard that he dropped the lower part of his eighth biscuit and left the table without any break-fast. CABRIOLET.
